‖ Pasha, pacha (pɑ·ʃa, pæ·ʃa). Forms: 7–8 pascha, 7 passa, 9 pashaw, pacha, 8– pasha. [Turkish pāshā, generally held to be the same as bāsh from bāsh head, chief, in some Eastern Turkish dialects pāsh. The form with s was app. the earlier, being that first adopted in Western languages: see BASHAW.

In Turkish there is no hard-and-fast line between the length and value steps; and in the case of p, b, the variation is increased by the absence of p in Arabic and the occasional replacement of Persian and Turkish p by b (cf. peshcush, pishcush, bakhsheesh, etc.): this may have resulted in interchange of b, p, and survival of the b in pasha. Some however think pāshā and bāsh originally distinct words (cf. quot. 1587); Zenker distinguishes bāshā, the officer of the Janissaries, from pāshā, which is now largely a civil title; but Barbier says that the title, in either form, was under the ancient regime exclusively a military one. The best Turkish scholars think there is no ground for connecting the word in any way with Pers. pādshāh king or emperor, Turkish pādishāh (for Bahan.)

A title borne in Turkey by officers of high rank, as military commanders, and governors of provinces. Formerly, esp. in the case of military commanders, written BASHAW.

There are three grades of pashas, formerly distinguished by the number of horse-tails displayed as a symbol of war; the highest grade of three tails corresponding to a commanding general, admiral, or governor of numerous rank; the second of two tails to a general of division or vice-admiral, etc.; the third of one tail to a general of brigade, rear-admiral, or naval officer of corresponding rank.

Pasigraphy (pæsi·grăfi). [irreg. f. Gr. πᾶς for all + -GRAPHY.] A name given to a system of writing proposed for universal use, with characters representing ideas instead of words, so as to be (like the ordinary numerals 1, 2, 3, etc.) intelligible to persons of all languages. Applied originally to a system proposed in 1796; subsequently to others having a similar object.

Pasquin (pæ·skwin), sb. [ad. It. Pasquino, in L. Pasquillus, F. Pasquin.

Pasquino or Pasquillo was the name popularly given to a mutilated statue, or piece of ancient statuary, discovered at Rome in the year 1501, and set up by Cardinal Carafa at the corner of his palace near the Piazza Navona. Under his patronage, it became the annual custom on St. Mark's Day to 'restore' temporarily and dress up this torso to represent some historical or mythological personage of antiquity; on which occasion professors and students of the newly revived Ancient Learning were wont to salute Pasquin in Latin verses which were usually pasted or pinned on the statue. In process of time these pasquinades or pasquinades tended to become satirical, and the term began to be applied, not only to Rome, but to other countries, to satirical compositions and lampoons, political, ecclesiastical, or personal, the anonymous authors of which often sheltered themselves under the conventional name of Pasquin. According to Muratori, in the preface to the printed collection of the Pasquinate of 1509, the name Pasquino or Pasquillo originated in that of a schoolmaster (Schiavone non magister Dadi) who lived opposite the spot where the statue was found; a later tradition given by Castelvetro, 1558–9, made Pasquino a cynical tailor or shoemaker) another of 1501 calls him a barber. See Muratori in Rivista Antologica (1874) I. 251, 259, D. Gnoli ibid. 1890 I. 321, 1891 Ibidem & Pasquino. The belated form Pasquillus was already c 1544 applied both to the author and the pasquinade, in which extended application it was coming followed also by Pasquino.]

OF. it had come to denote progression or moving on from place to place. Pass and pace are the same word, the forms having been in later times differentiated, and pace restricted to those senses which are akin to or derived from Pace sb., while pass has been retained for the other original senses and the newer ones developed from them.]

In Eng. pass has become the most general verb expressing outward motion: passing may consist in going, running, riding, flying, swimming, sailing, floating, gliding, or in being carried, driven, driven, impelled, or moved on, in any way. In many cases the former sense can be expressed by go, especially when construed with, or extended by, prepositions or adverbs expressing varieties of direction, etc.; but it can be used in many transferred senses in which go is inapplicable: e.g. to pass into a new state or condition, or to a new subject. It differs from come in expressing the other end or term than the action. Without any prepositional or adverbial extension, the original and literal use is now chiefly confined to branches I. and VI., being otherwise less frequent than the derived uses, and usual case in II and C.

As in other verbs, vbs. of motion (go, come, depart, etc.), the perfect of resultant condition had originally the auxiliary be (as in passed, they were passed): cf. Shaks. 1, 1598, 3 1380, 1 Jn. 14..., 2, 1 1400, etc. This was sometimes retained even when pass was transitive: cf. 1609 Jas. Speech, 1 1711 Addison, 14..., 1526, etc. Hence arose the later Past prep., q. v.

WGer. pæþ has recently been compared with Gr. πάτος 'trodden or beaten way', and with Zend pañt (panthan, panthant 'way'; but in these it could be related only as a borrowed term, which with a word of such a union is most unlikely. On the other hand, the occurrence of original initial p in Teutonic is surprising: if this is an example, fōt would correspond to pre-Teut. bōt, which has suggested the root of L. battuĕre to beat.]

I. A way beaten or trodden by the feet of men or beasts; a track formed incidentally by passage between places, rather than expressly planned and constructed to accommodate traffic; a narrow unmade and (usually) unmetalled way across the open country, through woods or fields, over a mountain, etc.; a footway or footpath, as opposed to a road for vehicles; hence applied also to a walk made for foot-passengers, in a garden, park, wood, or the like. Sometimes said more vaguely of any way or road: cf. sense 3.

2. One who disinterestedly or self-sacrificingly exerts himself to promote the welfare of his country; 'one whose ruling passion is the love of his country' (J.); one who maintains and defends his country's freedom or rights.

In this use, at first, as in French (see Littré), with 'good', 'true', 'worthy', or other commendatory adjective; cf. 'good citizen'. 'Patriot' for 'good patriot' is rare before 1660. At that time often applied to one who supported the rights of the country against the King and court.

b. The name has been at various times borne or assumed by persons or parties whose claim to it has been disputed, denied, or ridiculed by others. Hence the name itself fell into discredit in the earlier half of the 18th c., being used, according to Dr. Johnson, 'ironically for a factious disturber of the government'. So sometimes at a later date, 'Irish Patriot'.

Patron (pē·trŏn), sb. Forms: 3–6 patroun, 4–7 patrone, 5 paterne, 5– patron. [ME. patroun, a. OF. patron (12th c.), patron (13th c.), = Pr. patron, padron, Cat. padrí, Sp. patron (padrone), Pg. patrono, It. padrone (a patrone), ad. L. patrōn-us protector, defender, patron, deriv. of patr-, patr-em father.

L. patronus had the senses of protector and defender of clients (viz. of individuals, of cities, or provinces); also, the former master of a freedman or freedwoman; an advocate or defender before a court of justice, or, generally, of any person or cause. In med.L. and Romance is acquired the sense of patron saint, patron or advowee (advocatus) of a church, and that of lord or master, in many specific connexions; also that of exemplar, pattern. Most of these senses are represented in Eng. patron, but the order in which they were taken into Eng. does not correspond to that of their appearance in Latin and Romance; hence a ‘patron of a church’, being the earliest to be adopted. The orders here followed is one of convenience; the chronological order may be seen from the quotations. The terse FATHER is now differentiated in spelling, and is treated as a distinct word.

(Note. According to the Spanish etymology, pavana (found in D. Pineda 1740) is a derivative of Sp. pavo peacock, 'in allusion to the movements and ostentation of that bird'; so Chambers 1727, from Dict. Trévoux 1721, 'a grave kind of dance, borrowed from the Spaniards, wherein the performers make a kind of wheel or tail before each other, like that of a peacock: whence the name'; so in M. Compan, Dict. de la Danse 1787, Littré, etc. See also Elyot's Gouernour, ed. Croft, I. 250, 240 notes, Cleas. 12. 3803 and cf. the Germanic name Pfauenschritt 'peacock-dance'. Others have attributed to the dance an Italian origin, and viewed pavana as reduced from Padovana 'Paduan' (which occurs in A. Scoto 1568 a 1580). MS. collection of airs and dances by Dowland, Holborne, and others, in Quek. Univ. Lib., Mus. 4. 23 contains (near the end) a piece entitled Padoanna de la Milanesa. But the phonetic difficulties in identifying the two words are serious; and they are prob. distinct terms, which may afterwards have sometimes been confused by those who knew the history of one of them only: cf. s. v. 1. The name of the hilly district in the north-west of Derbyshire, England; divided into the High Peak and the Low or Lower Peak, approximately corresponding to the modern Hundreds of High Peak and Wirksworth respectively.

In 12–13th c. the word seems to have been applied as the proper name of the Castle Hill at Castleton, under which is the Peak Cavern. The post-Conquest use of Peak in the sense of OE. Pēaclond seems to have arisen through the application of the name of Peverel's castle to the district thence governed. The Ordnance Map, without any warrant in local usage, gives the name 'The Peak' to an elevated plateau or moorland mass to the High Peak Hundred now known as Kinder Scout, which is the highest ground in Derbyshire.

Peak (pēk), *sb.*2 Forms: 6 pek, peke, 8–7 peake, 8 peek, 7– peak. [Known from 16th c. as a later equivalent of PEAK *sb.*1; in 15th c. the cheric. pekid, PEAKED, appears as an equivalent of PEAKE. The phonetic relations are difficult to understand : but cf. MLG. pēk, pēke, 'pīek, pīke, pointed iron instruments'. It is notable that in sense 1, peak is identical with beak. (Ir. peac is from Eng.).

The connexion between Peak *sb.*2 and peak appears in the adjs. peaked, peaky. If the pike, the long point of a 15th c. shoe, mentioned in Wyclif c 1380, see Index of Archaic in Longland P. Pl., 1377. These appear to give us peaky, peaked (shoes), being the first appearance of the pike, peak-form. Peake itself is exemplified in Palsgr., 1530. In the 16th c. the forms pike and peak appear to have gone apart in sense, pike being confined more to a sharp pointed or pricking point (perhaps under the influence of Fr. pic), the weapon, mentioned early in that century, while peak is more consistent with the notion of a projecting point, not specially sharp or sometimes. Peak as a pointed projecting, or conical mountain (quot. 1) is a still later (1756 c) substitution for an earlier pike.]

Many identify the word with med.L. perula, in Isidore pirula, dim. of L. pirum, Gen. Rom. pear, used in reference to shape. Others think perula altered from perna, the form in Neapolitan and Sicilian dial., and found in Sicilian Lat., in Constitut. of Frederick King of Sicily, early 13th c. (Du Cange), which they would identify with L. perna, ham, leg of mutton, shell-fish (a kind of mussel), limpet, mentioned by Pliny. A dim. of the latter, pernula*, contracted in Du Cange ed. 1762 is favoured by Grübel. Another suggested source is L. globula globulus, whence, by dissimilation of l...l to p...l, pirula* (for which Littré compares Venetian and Veronese pirola from pilola). See Rhe, Lowe, Koenig, etc.]

I. 1. A saccous concretion formed within the shell of various bivalve molluscs around some foreign body (e.g. a grain of sand), composed of shiny layers of carbonate of lime interstratified with animal membrane; it is of hard smooth texture, of globular, pear-shaped, oval, or irregular form, and of various colours, usually white or bluish-grey; often having a beautiful lustre, and hence highly prized as a gem; formerly also used in medicine. See also MOTHER-OF-PEARL, SEED-PEARL.

The chief source is the Pearl-oyster, Meleagrina margaritifera, of the Indian Seas, but pearls are yielded by many other species, as well as by some freshwater shells, the pearl-mussels, Unionidæ.

Usage. As peat has from the beginning been applied in the north, not to the substance, but to a shaped and prepared piece of it (cf. the expressions 'to make peats', 'peat-making'), the suggestion is offered that we may have in it one of several instances in which a word orig. meaning 'piece' has become so largely the term for a piece of some particular substance. If this be so, there may be etymological connexion with the stem pelt-: which gave mod.L. pelta, pecia (>—Sp.pieza), It. pezza, F. pièce, 'piece', and is held to be of Celtic origin (Thurneysen Keltoromanen. 20). The Old Celtic cognate in the Book of Dare, have pet, gen.s. petis, in sense 'portion, piece'; with which Irish, cuidhiu (ed. 2) 120, compares Ulr. pit portion of food in Ler. Ml. Irish 866. (This word is supposed to have passed into Gaelic from a Scandinav. dialect; cf. Welsh pâls portion.)]

Peat[2] (pīt). Obs. or arch. [Common from c 1570 to 1640; re-introduced by Scott. Origin uncertain. (Not Sc., exc. in sense 3.)

[ME. pek, = OF. pek (13th c. in Godef., only one instance), frequent in AF., also latinized as pecium (a 1240), pekka; ulterior history unknown. Godefroy's OF. instance refers to corn for horses, which was also a chief use of pek in ME. In this respect pek was synonymous with F. picotin 'a peake or the fourth part of a bushelle...used only in the measuring of oats' (Cotgr.), a horse's feed of oats (Littré); in mod.L. picotinus. But the latter was evidently a diminutive of med.L. picarius, picherius, in OF. picotin a wine-measure (1278 in Godef.). The radical part of these words may be cognate with pick. The formal resemblances of picotin to F. picoter, 'to pick often, to peck as a bird', and of pek, peck to pick, pickle, Prov. pic, is notable; but pick etc. is known long before the vb., and cannot easily be derived from it.]

1. A word applied since the 17th c. to the triangular part, resembling a low gable, crowning the front of a building in the Grecian style of architecture, especially over a portico. It consists of a flat recessed field framed by a cornice and often ornamented with sculpture in relief. Also applied to similarly-placed members in the Roman and Renaissance styles, whether triangular, semicircular, or of other form, also to those of similar shapes placed over niches, doors, or windows. Hence, in Decorative art, any member of similar form and position, as one placed over the opening in an inglenook screen, etc.

α. 1592 R. D. Hypnerotomachia 20 b, The Cornishes...were correspondent and agreeing with the lofing out of the whol worke, the frollicod or Perroinant in Pedestals. 3. Comb., as pediment-like adj., pediment-wise adv.

1844 LOUDON Encycl. Agric. (ed. 3) 1158 II. App. C. 336 At the gable ends, the tranks (of which the walls were built) rise gradually pediment-wise to the height of fourteen feet. 1854 PHYFFEN Trans. 1. 1. 11. 45 An elevated vase or bundle of a triangular pediment-like form.

†Note. Pediment, in Evelyn pedament in Rundle Holme pedowment, has the appearance of a derivation in -ment, of L. pēs, pedis 'foot'; but L. pedimentum was a 'foundation, groundwork, base, or footing' (Forcell.) agrees with which the modern 'pediment' has no connexion. Evelyn's word was evidently an attempted improvement upon the workmen's pavement or pavenent, which the translator of Hypnerotomachia considered to be 'corrupt English' for pyramides. But the corruption of pavement to pavenent is difficult to imagine, and the conversion of pavement into Willis Architect. Normans. Middl. Ages (1856) 10 has declared) and is never more likely than pavenent was a workman's corruption of pyramid, which a triangular gable sometimes resembles in outline, and which is actually pronounced pavbeyer, or pavviyeyer by the villagers in some districts of England (e. g. in West Somersetsh.) to the present day. This would also better explain 'the pavenint of the Crumble to three-quarters, since the Pavenint in question had no 'pediment', but a curved roof in form of an open cycle. If this be the derivation, we have the series pyramid, pavenint, pavement, pedo-, pedi-, pedimentum.

But the Promptorium (c 1440) has both peddlar and pedlere with distinct explanations, and without any reference to each other.]
